

Direct Marketing and Manuscript Solicitation Policy

The African Journal of Reproductive Health (AJRH), is committed to conducting all direct marketing and manuscript solicitation activities in a professional, ethical, transparent, and non-intrusive manner.

Any communication undertaken on behalf of AJRH to promote the journal, invite manuscript submissions, or communicate with prospective authors, reviewers, editors, or other members of the scholarly community shall be appropriately targeted and relevant to the recipient's area of expertise or interest. The journal does not support indiscriminate mass emailing, excessive solicitation, or the use of misleading or deceptive promotional practices.

Manuscript invitations may be sent to researchers, authors, reviewers, editorial board members, and other scholars whose expertise or previous scholarly activities are relevant to the scope of the journal. Such invitations do not constitute a promise or guarantee of acceptance or publication. All manuscripts submitted following an invitation are subject to the journal's established editorial and peer-review procedures.

All information communicated in AJRH's promotional materials, website, emails, calls for papers, and manuscript invitations shall be accurate, current, and verifiable. The journal shall not make false or misleading claims concerning its publisher, editorial board, publication process, indexing and abstracting status, impact or performance, peer-review procedures, publication fees, acceptance, or publication timelines.

Direct marketing communications shall clearly identify the African Journal of Reproductive Health and its publisher, the Women's Health and Action Research Centre (WHARC), and shall provide sufficient information for recipients to understand the purpose of the communication. The journal shall respect requests from recipients who do not wish to receive further promotional or manuscript-solicitation communications.

AJRH reviews its direct marketing and manuscript solicitation practices periodically to ensure that communications remain appropriate, well targeted, truthful, and consistent with accepted standards of scholarly publishing ethics.
